

In July 2023, I posted a job advert for a remote geopolitical research assistant, to help with a Substack covering diplomacy (<https://edwardmdruce.substack.com/>) that I'd begun writing.

The advert received over 900 applicants in the space of a few weeks (<https://edwardmdruce.substack.com/i/135764408/thoughts-from-around-the-world>), from all over the world.

I whittled a shortlist down to 12 people and, from that, picked one person for the role: Se Taylor. It had been Se's first ever job interview.

Over the past 20 months, Se has been instrumental in helping:

1) Put together a chronology of very little-known diplomatic talks between Russia and Ukraine that happened in April 2022. This (<https://x.com/EdwardMDruce/status/1716485332378493256>) received praise from many world-leading academics.

2) Se voice-overed (into English) an interview with former Israeli Prime Minister, Naftali Bennett, that has received over 125,000 views (<https://twitter.com/EdwardMDruce/status/1728342410948759600>)

3) And co-presented, on camera, founding principles for what we set out to do: <https://listeningto.org/guiding-quotations/>

Se is remarkably talented at finding obscure and hard-to-obtain information on the web. Se considers herself very much a “detective” in the pursuit of such information – which is fitting. Se has developed extremely novel ways of navigating foreign language media, that provides a very different (often much more accurate) picture of world events – which she came up with entirely independently.

If you need a research “detective” to assist you in scouring the web, for little-known gems, I recommend Se highly.
